

Living the Dakota Life

A NEW program on RFD-TV tells tales of a territory full of infinite variety.

Ever wondered what a day in the life of a rodeo clown is like? Want to learn the art of tying a fly that is sure to snag you the big one? Wondering where to find the world's largest jackalope factory? If so, or even if these thoughts have never crossed your mind, you will want to watch Dakota Life, South Dakota Public Broadcasting's television magazine program, when it enters RFD-TV's lineup this September.

With Dakota Life available on RFD-TV, viewers from all over the country can experience a program that has long been a favorite in South Dakota. "Dakota Life one of our most popular programs, both for the staff as well as our viewers, because we get a chance to highlight some of the amazing treasures we have in South Dakota," says producer Rina Bellew.

Dakota Life takes to South Dakota's highways and byways to find the stories that make life in the state unique. It includes visits with artists, musicians, artisans, teachers, historians, museum curators and other South Dakotans with a story to tell. The results are extraordinary snapshots of ordinary lives.

Although South Dakota is a small state, with a population of only about 750,000, it has an endless number of stories to share. From
